

Answer on Question #37891, Economics, Microeconomics

Demand is greater at dinner. Since lunch is often a lighter meal, there are therefore a greater number of possible substitutes and a restaurant has to lower its price point to compete with fast-food, and fast-casual establishments which are not normally competitors for dinner customers.