

Domination of Nehru-Gandhi Dynasty

A wave of discontent among the India's population appeared because of two main reasons. First, after dismantling the quasi-socialist doctrine and initiating economic reforms, the India's government appeared to be inefficient in its struggling with poverty in the country. Many people go abroad to earn money and help their families to survive. The standards of life in the country are extremely low. Weak economy, the low educational level, and bad roads are the recognizable features of India now. The second reason is that unfair power inheriting takes place in the country. Being the same unit with the Congress party, the representatives of the Nehru-Gandhi family inherit the power in the state. The dynasty has been ruling India since 1947. Nevertheless, the fact that an individual has a talented grandfather does not mean that this person has similar outstanding skills. Then, the staff of the government does not represent the real structure of India's population. Making approximately 12% -14% of India's population, Muslims represent the great majority in the Congress Party. The above-mentioned reasons make India's population get annoyed. People say that they "have been supporters of the [Gandhi] family for decades. But now [they] have to think twice" (Burke, 2014).

References

Burke, J. (2014). India elections: Domination of Nehru-Gandhi dynasty under threat. Retrieved from <http://www.theguardian.com/world/2014/apr/07/india-elections-nehru-gandhi-dynasty>.