

Speaking about women who continue being engaged in the abusive relationship, it is very difficult to rely on their common sense. The primary reaction to home violence should be seeking for protection and escaping from the dangerous conditions. However, these weighty arguments are insufficient for the victims of domestic rape who value their relationship more than themselves. Perhaps, such people do not have enough courage and self-confidence in order to ruin the family that they have and to start a new life. Even more, subconsciously, the victims might be satisfied with their subdued position. Therefore, it is reasonable to assume that the voice of common sense is very quiet and is not heard by people who continue to live with tyrants.